CAPSULE SUMMARY

The Joseph Travers House, at 9309 Whiskey Bottom Road in Laurel, was built in several phases and now faces north east on the southwest side of Whiskey Bottom Road. The two-story, three bay, frame Folk Victorian's front section is actually the second major building phase; the middle section of the house, two stories with two rooms on each floor, is supposedly the earliest part of the building. The two-story rear wing of the house is a 1980's addition that is very compatible with the historical architecture. The front section of the house takes a tri-gable, center hall form with a side gabled roof with a small central cross gable. Two interior brick chimneys pierce the ridge of the roof of the front section of the house on either side of the center hall. The middle section of the house has a gabled roof perpendicular to the roof on the front section of the house. Another interior brick chimney is centrally located at the ridge of the roof of the middle section of the house. The entire house, including the modern addition, is clad in wooden German siding and the roof is asphalt shingle. The front and rear sections of the house rest on brick foundations. The middle portion of the house may rest on a stone or composite masonry foundation (it is not visible from the exterior but stone is visible in the cellar). The house now sits on three acres surrounded by residential development but, in the early 20th century, was associated with 10 acres and a working farm.

The Joseph Travers House is significant under Criteria C in the area of architecture. It is a very well maintained example of an early 20th century Folk Victorian with a potentially earlier wing and is one of the last historic dwellings on Whiskey Bottom Road. It seems very likely that a dwelling was first built on the property around 1862, additional improvements were made around 1867, structures were removed from the property for some reason around 1880, and the existing Folk Victorian dwelling was constructed around 1890 or 1900 by Joseph Travers.

Prepare both a one paragraph summary and a comprehensive description of the resource and its various elements as it exists today.

The Joseph Travers House, at 9309 Whiskey Bottom Road in Laurel, was built in several phases and now faces north east on the southwest side of Whiskey Bottom Road. The two-story, three bay, frame Folk Victorian's front section is actually the second major building phase; the middle section of the house, two stories with two rooms on each floor, is supposedly the earliest part of the building. The two-story rear wing of the house is a 1980's addition that is very compatible with the historical architecture. The front section of the house takes a tri-gable, center hall form with a side gabled roof with a small central cross gable. Two interior brick chimneys pierce the ridge of the roof of the front section of the house on either side of the center hall. The middle section of the house has a gabled roof perpendicular to the roof on the front section of the house. Another interior brick chimney is centrally located at the ridge of the roof of the middle section of the house. The entire house, including the modern addition, is clad in wooden German siding and the roof is asphalt shingle. The front and rear sections of the house rest on brick foundations. The middle portion of the house may rest on a stone or composite masonry foundation (it is not visible from the exterior but stone is visible in the cellar). The house now sits on three acres surrounded by residential development but, in the early 20th century, was associated with 10 acres and a working farm.

The front (north) façade of the house is three bays wide with a central door on the first story flanked by one 2/1 window on each side. The door is glazed and paneled with a stained glass transom. On the second story, the central bay holds paired 1/1 windows flanked by one 2/1 window on each side. In the central cross gable there is a square one-light fixed window. The window sills are wood and the exterior window trim has a simple bead. Vertical corner boards also have a simple bead. A one-story full width hipped roof porch stretches across the front façade. The wood floored porch has turned supports and lacks a balustrade. Two extremely ornate lightning rods are found on the peak of the central cross gable and the peak of the east gable. The rods appear to be twisted wrought iron that flares in the middle to form a sort of cage. In the 'cage' is a red glass ball about the size of a baseball.

On the east side façade of the house, all three building phases are visible. In the front section of the house, there are two 2/1 windows on the first floor and paired 1/1 windows on the second floor. A square one-light window is found in the gable and there is a two-light window in the foundation. The central section of the house, the portion that is supposedly older, has two 2/2 windows on the second story and a door and a window on the first story. The first story is entirely covered by an enclosed porch and it is unclear if the door opening onto this porch is original. If this section of the house is earlier than the front section, it seems very likely that this would have been the front façade of the older house and the door opening may in fact be original. The 1980 addition on the rear of the house compliments the historical nature of the house very nicely. There is a glazed and paneled door on the first floor along with a 2/2 wooden window and a paired 1/1 and a 2/2 window on the second floor. The door is sheltered by a hipped roof porch that is supported by turned supports that match those on the front porch of the house. This portion of the house is also clad in the same wooden German siding as the rest of the building.

The west side façade of the house is very similar to the east façade. The front section of the house has two 2/1 windows on the first floor and paired 1/1 windows on the second with a square one-light window in the gable and a two-light window in the foundation. The middle portion of the house has two 2/2 windows on the second story and an enclosed porch on the first story. Another lighting rod, similar to the other two but lacking the 'cage' and red ball, is found on the rear (south) peak of the middle section of the house. The 1980's addition has four 2/2 windows, a paired 1/1 window, and an arched vent in the gable on the west façade.

The rear (south) façade of the house is mostly the 1980's addition with several 2/2 windows, but part of the south façade of the middle section of the house is also visible. It has two vertically aligned 2/2 windows, one on each floor, and an arched vent in the gable.

Inside the house, the first and second period sections are identical. The front door enters into a central hall containing the stair to the second floor. The newel post for the stair is square and massive. Windows and doors have bulls eye corner blocks and wide reeded architraves. There is one room on either side of the hall and each has an original Franklin stove with elaborate carved mantles with columns. The stove inset is surrounded by tiles in both cases. From the back of the center hall a door opens into the dining room – one of the two rooms on the first floor of the original section of the house. The dining room has a Franklin stove and surrounding mantle identical to those found in the front section of the house and the window and door trim also matches the front section. A doorway from the dining room leads into the kitchen, also in the middle section of the house, which has been entirely, and beautifully, redone. What may originally have been a porch on the west façade of the middle section of the house is now a breakfast nook. An enclosed stair rises out of the kitchen, along the eastern wall. The 1980's addition is accessed via a hall connecting to the kitchen.

On the second floor, the floorplan is the same with two rooms and a hall in the front section of the house, two more connected rooms in the middle section, and a large master suite in the 1980's addition. Detailing throughout the two older sections is consistent.

There are two separate basements beneath the house. There is a brick walled, cement floored basement beneath the front section of the house that is used for storage and mechanical systems. There is a completely separate basement beneath part of the middle section of the house which has been turned into a wine cellar. This basement is accessed via a stair from what is now the enclosed porch on the east side of the building. This stair is stacked beneath the enclosed stair to the second floor. This portion of the basement has a dirt floor and some stone in the walls. Unfortunately, in the conversion to a wine cellar, insulation was added to the ceiling and most of the wall space and it is not possible to see the construction details that could determine conclusively if this part of the house is in fact earlier than the front section.

There are now two outbuildings associated with the house. A brick and cinder block garage with a gambrel roof is located just to the southeast of the house. A frame outbuilding on a brick foundation is located behind, and slightly down hill from, the house. This outbuilding was falling down in the 1980's and was rebuilt by the current owner using salvaged materials where possible. According to a neighbor, this building was originally used to house animals. Most of the remaining three acres associated with the property is a grassy lawn, though the property is dotted with mature trees.

The Joseph Travers House is significant under Criteria C in the area of architecture. It is a very well maintained example of an early 20th century Folk Victorian with a potentially earlier wing and is one of the last historic dwellings on Whiskey Bottom Road. It seems very likely that a dwelling was first built on the property around 1862, additional improvements were made around 1867, structures were removed from the property for some reason around 1880, and the existing Folk Victorian dwelling was constructed around 1890 or 1900 by Joseph Travers.

The property associated with the Joseph Travers House was originally part of a grant called Sappingtons Sweep, 7 acres of which was sold to Susan Cole by William Sherwood, Jr. for a purchase price of $200 in 1859. Susan Cole sold 2 1/2 or 3 acres of that land to Robert Cole for $125 in 1861. It is believed that Robert Cole and his wife Martha were the first to build on the 3-acre parcel because in 1863 they sold the same 3-acres for $1000 - substantially more than they bought it for less than two years earlier. The 1860 Martenet map indicates that there is only one house located right on the south side of Whiskey Bottom Road between All Saints Church and the Turnpike - it is labeled A. Cole. The names of surrounding property owners, including Holland and Ober, appear in the boundary descriptions of the subsequent deeds for the 3-acre parcel in question. The same 3 acres and the improvements thereon changed hands again in 1866 for $1200. It is believed that George B. Rowell improved the property further around 1867 because he sold the same 3-acre parcel that he bought in 1866 for $1200 for a purchase price of $2000 in 1868. The 3 acres were also clearly being cultivated in the 1860's because the deed from Rowell to James Abrams in 1868 specifically includes "the crops and vegetables now growing on the property." James Abrams and his wife Elizabeth sold the 3-acre parcel and the improvements to Henry Stotler for $2000 in 1877. The property is shown on the 1878 Hopkins map of Howard County and the dwelling is labeled "Judge Abram." During the 8 years of Stotlers ownership, something happened to the property to devalue it. When Stotler sold the property in 1885 to Elias Travers, Travers only paid $1000 for it. It is possible that one of the buildings on the property burned down sometime in that 8-year period, but whatever the reason, when Travers acquired the 3 acres, it was worth half as much as when Stotler acquired it. A court case in 1888 between various members of the Travers family resulted in Charles Stanley being named Trustee and authorized to sell the property. Joseph Travers bought the 3 acres for $1000 in 1888 from Stanley. The deed wasn't executed until 1891 for some reason and in the 1891 deed, the property is described as "being the property upon which the said Joseph Travers now resides."

It is believed that Joseph Travers is the one who built the two-story Folk Victorian front section of the house and therefore it is his name that is appended to the structure as it stands today. Travers owned the property for 20 years and when he sold it to James Roseberry in 1908, the purchase price was $2600. The deed from Travers to Roseberry describes the three-acre property as "being the same property upon which the said Joseph Travers and wife for a long time resided." Since the acreage remained the same, Travers clearly improved the buildings on the site in order to warrant a $1600 price increase. Stylistically, a construction date of ca. 1900 fits very well with the Folk Victorian elements of the house. The Roseberrys acquired additional adjoining land to bring the total acreage to 10 acres during the early 20th century. Edward Kennedy, who purchased the property in 1939, sold off 7 acres leaving the house on 3 acres. It is not known, however, how the boundary lines of the current 3-acre parcel compare to those of the late 19th century 3-acre parcel beyond the fact that they both surround the existing house.

The current owner believes that the rear wing (what is now the middle section) of the house predates the front two-story, three-bay section. According to the deed evidence, this is not out of the question since there do seem to have been structures on the property as early as 1862. Unfortunately, construction and stylistic evidence for such an early date is not visible in this section of the house. Instead, the interior detailing of this portion of the house matches the interior of the ca. 1900 section. And the insulating of what is now the wine cellar has obscured construction details visible from the basement that would at least indicate whether or not the rear wing was built at the same time as the front section. However, the presence of an enclosed stair in the rear wing of the house and a dirt floored basement beneath it that does not connect to the basement beneath the front section, in addition to the single pile, two room wide, two story configuration with a central chimney indicate that the rear wing certainly could have stood alone as a modest frame dwelling.

Mrs. Regene LePore lives next door to the Joseph Travers House now but her family actually owned the old house in the mid-20th century. Her father, Edward Kennedy, bought the property, which at that time consisted of 10 acres, in 1939 and Mrs. LePore moved in shortly thereafter when she was 18. She reports that the property was a working farm at least until the 1950's or 60's with some crops and cows, pigs, and chickens. When Mrs. LePore first moved to the area she reports that it was very rural and isolated. Only nine houses were located on Whiskey Bottom Road in between Route 1 and Route 216 and the dirt road was always either dusty or muddy.

The Joseph Travers House is a very well maintained example of a Folk Victorian dwelling. The Folk Victorian is a classic vernacular style in which folk house forms were decorated with stylistic details from Victorian pattern books. The symmetrical I-house form of the front section of the Joseph Travers House is a very common folk form, while the turned porch supports are indicative of the Victorian influence. The Joseph Travers House is significant under Criteria C in the area of architecture and is one of the last remaining 19th century dwellings in this rapidly developing area.
